These devices store information in a number of memory cells by storing electrical charge in the cells. Because of the nature of flash memory, the amount of charge stored in a memory cell may be limited. This limitation is more apparent in devices that use a single-level cell (SLC) memory cell because these cells store only one amount of charge, which may not be significant. As technology advances, it has become possible to use a multi-level cell (MLC) memory cell to store more than one charge amount, thus providing a better indication of data. For example, in a four-level cell (4LC) memory cell, four levels of charge may be stored. This allows the MLC memory cell to store a larger amount of information in a smaller amount of space. The charge stored on the cell, however, may leak over time, especially when the memory cell is cycled frequently.
